

Zero Point Event

February 29th, 2012 the world nearly came to an end. At least that is the view held in the United States after the detonation of the Zero Point Warhead in New York or Washington D.C. [the origin of which is unknown]. Even after years of speculation, the Zero Point Event is poorly understood and no one voice of credibility has risen to dispel the many rumors. Most citizens of the United States believe that the Zero Point Event was the detonation of an experimental weapon developed by North Korea or Iran with the aid of China. However, such a theory leaves many unexplained questions such as how it could have been developed in total secrecy and how was it deployed without any advanced warning. Another major theory is a meteor-strike on the Eastern seaboard. Historic impacts have incinerated hundreds of square miles and gouged massive craters into the Earth. A meteor laced with radioactive minerals or unknown items of stellar origin could explain many of the hazards and weird events since the Zero Point Event. Regardless of what caused the Zero Point Event, America was dealt a crippling blow that would bleed her strength for generations.

The most popular theories for the Zero Point Event according to web traffic:

- The event was a terrorist attack [North Korea, Iran, China, Islamic Extremists, Fundamentalists].
- The event was caused by a scientific experiment that accelerated out of control.
- The event was caused by aliens [Insectoids hibernating in brains, Hyper-intelligent spirit invaders, and classical grays].
- The event was caused by “god” and is the beginning of the “end times.” [or Shiva’s Rebirth]
- The event is a hoax [US government, Corporate Interests].

The theories have points that make them appealing to those with certain mind-sets, but they obviously have problems as well. Even the most reputable explanations fall short.

Also, the rise of other phenomena poses a problem for the more rationale explanations. Far more people are willing to believe in supernatural powers and events than they were prior to 2012 but the true believers are still considered odd-fellows by much of the general public. Some believe that the Zero Point Event and the rise in supernatural encounters are connected at some fundamental level that has yet to be explained but just as many who claim to “believe” view the increased supernatural activity and the Zero Point Event as two separate events.
